

Green Skills for Tomorrow: Agricultural Innovation in: Vocational Training across Borders

Hybrid networking event with the African Green Store Network

hosted by the Center for Rural Development

Context:

The event will bring together stakeholders from the Pan-African network “African Green Store Network” (AGSN), including representatives from practice-oriented vocational schools in the agricultural and horticultural sectors, as well as interested partners in Germany. AGSN is a network of 32 institutions from 12 African countries. The aim is to share tested and validated knowledge from vocational training centers. The AGSN target group consists of young professionals in the agricultural sector, from production to extension. AGSN members play a crucial role in promoting climate-resilient, sustainable intensification through the dissemination of socio-ecological innovations. Their efforts support graduates' successful transition into the labor market, fostering career opportunities and self-employment. Participating institutions bring extensive experience in South-South and North-South cooperation, combining practical expertise with virtual collaboration.

Discussion questions

- How can agricultural training centers in Africa promote bioeconomy innovations, like climate-smart farming, through South-South collaboration? What role can digital platforms play in enhancing knowledge sharing across these networks?
- What policy support is needed to strengthen sustainable bioeconomy practices in African training centers, and how can collaboration among centers, governments, and stakeholders—both locally and through South-South networks—drive innovation?
- Which sustainable farming practices have been most effective in African contexts, and how can South-South collaboration and communities of practice improve communication and scale these methods across regions?
